[Kent Layne Oots]Terrorism as a phenomenon in the international system over the last decade and a half has spawned a new field of academic study. The field, which for lack of a better term can be referred to as terrorism scholarship, is an eclectic undertaking which includes scholarship from history, economics, sociology, law, and political science.Next, a theory is developed, based on rational choice political theory, which treats transnational terrorist organizations as political interest groups.The development of the theory allows for the derivation of twenty-two specific hypotheses related to two organizational variables, i.e., size of the acting group and presence of terrorist coalitions, at the operational level.
